Ministerial Salaries

Ministerial salaries are currently governed by the Ministerial and Other Salaries Act 1975 (as amended) and are updated periodically by Orders (which are statutory instruments). The Order first has to be approved in draft by a resolution of each House. Like Members' pay, the official salary of Ministers has been the subject of review by the Review Body on Senior Salaries (SSRB - previously the Top Salaries Review Body) since 1971. Current salary rates are quoted on page 3. For information on the salaries of Members of Parliament, see Factsheet M5.

Summary

Government ministers, the Speaker of the House of Commons and Deputy Speakers, as well as the Leader of the Opposition and Opposition Chief and Deputy Chief Whips are entitled to a salary in addition to their salaries as Members of Parliament. The current rates of salary are given in the table on page 3.

Ministers have always been entitled to a salary, but it was not until the Ministers of the Crown Act 1937 that there was any comprehensive treatment of the subject. The current legislation governing salaries for Ministers is the Ministerial and Other Salaries Act 1975 (c.27) (as amended).

Salaries are updated annually (from 1 April) according to the average increase in the mid-points of the Senior Civil Service pay bands (the same formula currently used for salaries of Members of Parliament). Ministers do not always take the maximum salary entitlement and they have sometimes opted to take reduced salaries. On 8 May 1997, the incoming Labour Government announced that the Prime Minister and Cabinet Ministers would not take the post election increases. Similarly, they also took a reduced salary throughout the 1997 Parliament, although their pensions continued to be based on full salary entitlements. After the 2001 General Election, the Cabinet chose to take their full salaries.

Ministers who are in the House of Commons also receive their salary as a Member of Parliament (currently £64,766). Prior to July 1996, they received a reduced parliamentary salary on the grounds that ministerial office impinged on the individual's ability to undertake the full range of an MPs' parliamentary duties. In July 1996, the Review Body on Senior Salaries (SSRB, successor to the TSRB) recommended in its 38th report that Ministers should receive a full parliamentary salary.¹ Following a debate on 10 July 1996, the House agreed to accept the recommendation.²

In March 1999, the SSRB recommended that the salaries for Ministers below Cabinet level in the House of Lords and certain other Office holders in the Lords should be increased over and above the standard annual uprating for Ministers.³ A one-off increase of £8,500 was recommended to restore the relativity in pay arrangements between Ministers in the Lords and Ministers in the Commons. The Government accepted the recommendation, which was implemented by the Ministerial and Other Salaries Order 1999.

The Ministerial and Other Salaries Act 1975 (as amended) limits the number of ministerial salaries that can be paid at any one time to 109 (including the Lord Chancellor)⁴, although unpaid Ministers may be appointed. There is also a limit of 95 on the number of Members of the House of Commons who can be ministers at any one time.⁵ This does not include Parliamentary Private Secretaries.

Appendices A to C give historical details on levels of ministerial salaries.

History

Until the late eighteenth century, the regular salary of a Ministerial office represented the least important aspect of the income of a Minister. According to Macaulay's History of England:

"From the nobleman who held the White Staff and the Great Seal, down to the humblest tidewaiter and gauger, what would now be called gross corruption was practised without disguise and without reproach. Titles, places, commissions, pardons, were daily sold in the market overtly by the greatest dignitaries of the realm; in the 17th Century a statesman who was at the head of affairs might easily, and without giving scandal, accumulate in no long time, an estate amply sufficient to support a dukedom." [vol 1, pp 307-10]

The period of reform of Ministers' salaries and incomes began with Edmund Burke's bill introduced in 1782, which became "An Act to enable His Majesty to recompense the Services of Persons holding, or who have held, certain high and efficient Civil Offices". This abolished several paid offices and positions which were considered to be outdated and referred to a "new and economical Plan (which) it is intended to be adopted concerning the reimbursement of his Majesty's Ministers". Edmund Burke described his Bill as "a cutting off of all those sources of influence which were so derogatory to the spirit of the Constitution, and have proved so fatal to this country".

In the fifty years after 1782, more and more paid offices and pensions were abolished; in some cases the actual salary was reduced as well. The 1831 Select Committee on the Reduction of Salaries (1830-31 HC 322, Vol III, p445) further recommended further reductions and reform. For example, the Home Secretary's salary was reduced by £1,000 to £5,000. By the time of the Reform Act 1832, ministerial office could no longer be said to offer much financial gain. For example, William Pitt the Younger, had a net income as First Lord of the Treasury of about £5,000 and from late 1792 he also received £4,382 gross as Lord Warden. However, the costs of official life were such that this was insufficient and he died deeply in debt.

The 1850 Select Committee on Official Salaries (HC 611) made no major changes to the structure suggested by the 1831 Committee but it is of special interest because of the variety and number of witnesses who agreed that a degree of proper remuneration was absolutely necessary. For example, evidence was given by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Charles Wood:

Question 101: Mr Ellice - If you were to reduce the salaries of public offices very much, would not the consequence be, that no persons who had not large private fortunes could venture to undertake them?

Answer: Sir Charles Wood - That would be the consequence. If the salaries of these offices were brought so low as to exclude the possibility of men of small fortune taking them, I conceive it would do a most irreparable injury to the public service, and great injustice to such parties.

Question 102: Mr Ellice - If you do not give adequate salaries to persons holding these high offices, would not persons of moderate fortune be exposed to ruin and their private fortunes from the numerous applications that would be made to them, and from the expectations that would be entertained of their filling the offices with the same degree of hospitality which others in better circumstances had done?

Answer: Sir Charles Wood - Yes; some people have given up the profession of the law, for instance, for a political office, but they could not have done that, unless they had happened to have some private fortune to fall back upon in the event of their being turned out of office.

Developments between the 1850 select committee report and the Ministers of the Crown Act 1937 were summarised in the report of the 1964 Lawrence Committee.⁷ Some of the changes in ministerial salaries between 1780 and 1965 are set out in Appendix C of this Factsheet. This shows that for many of the great offices of state there was no change in salary for the hundred years between 1830 and 1930.

Ministerial Pay from 1937 to date

The Ministers of the Crown Act 1937 was the first comprehensive legislation relating to ministerial salaries. Several individual salary changes were made but apart from providing for a salary of £10,000 for the Prime Minister it generally gave statutory confirmation to the existing levels of remuneration. The Act also provided for the payment of an annual salary of £2,000 to the Leader of the Opposition.

The next Ministerial Salaries Act was in 1957. This Act followed the increase in the emoluments of Members of the House of Commons to a total of £1,750, of which £750 took the place of the existing sessional allowance. By repealing section 6(2) of the 1937 Act, Ministers could receive this allowance of £750 in addition to their salaries. The Act also made increased some ministerial salaries below £3,000 by providing:

- (1) that the salaries of the Financial Secretary and the Economic Secretary to the Treasury should be £3,750;
- (2) that other salaries should be increased by
 - (a) £1,000 where they were less than £2,000 and
 - (b) £750 in any other case.

The next change in ministerial salaries followed the 1964 Lawrence Report. The Lawrence Committee recommended that ministerial salaries should be substantially increased. One argument given was that Ministers were only allowed £750 of their parliamentary salary and were not able to supplement their ministerial salary with an occupation outside Parliament. The highest salary for senior ministers had been established as long ago as 1831. The Lawrence Committee's recommendations are listed in Appendix C. Ministers' salaries were increased considerably in 1965 by the Ministerial & Other Salaries Consolidated Act but these increases fell below the recommendations of the Lawrence Committee.

The next relevant statute was the Ministerial and Other Salaries Act 1972. This Act followed the Boyle Report of 1971 (Cmnd 4836). The Top Salaries Review Body (TSRB) had recommended increases in ministerial salaries and also "some element of remuneration... for the time spent by ministers in attending to the interests of their constituents" instead of just a tax allowance. The Boyle Report recommended a parliamentary salary of £3,000 which was accepted.

The 1972 Act implemented in full the TSRB recommendations as follows (the previous figures are shown in brackets):

Prime Minister	£20,000 (£14,000)
Cabinet Minister (Commons)	£13,000 (£8,500)
Minister of State	£7,500 - £9,500 (£5,625 - £7,625)
Parliamentary Secretary or	£5,500 (£3,750)

⁷ The Remuneration of Ministers and Members of Parliament, Cmnd 2516

Under Secretary of State

The Ministerial and other Salaries Act 1975 consolidated the existing legislation and is still in force as amended (see the Ministerial and Other Pensions and Salaries Act 1991), bringing together a number of previous enactments. Ministers' salaries are now periodically updated by means of Orders made under this Act. The table on page 3 gives further details of the present salaries of various ministers including, where appropriate, the parliamentary salary (see below).

The amounts stated are the maximum that can be paid; ministers have sometimes opted to take reduced salaries.

Parliamentary Salary for Ministers

In the Boyle Committee Report of 1979 (Cmnd 7598) it was confirmed that the parliamentary salary of a Minister should not equal the full salary of a backbench MP on the grounds that the responsibilities of Ministerial office impinged on the individual's ability to undertake the full range of an MP's Parliamentary activities. The Committee found that the average amount of time Ministers as a group devoted to constituency business had decreased since 1975.

In July 1996 the Review Body on Senior Salaries (SSRB, successor to the TSRB) recommended in its 38th Report (Cm 3330) that Ministers should receive the full parliamentary salary as from 1 July 1996, on the grounds that the responsibilities of a Minister to his or her constituents are the same as those of a backbencher. Following a debate on 10 July 1996 the House agreed to accept the recommendation.

Related Allowances

Ministers receive a number of allowances. Ministers who do not have an official London residence may claim a London Supplement, currently £2,916. Ministers in the House of Lords who maintain a second home in London receive a Night Subsistence Allowance of £33,990 per annum but they are not entitled to the London Supplement. All Ministers are entitled to an official car for departmental duties.

Since 1991, former Prime Ministers have been entitled to a Public Duty Costs Allowance (PDCA) to assist with additional office costs which they are liable to incur because of their special position in public life (not payable if the individual also occupies the position of Leader of the Opposition). The allowance was £52,760 (from 1 April 2001), equal in amount to the Members' Office Cost Allowance. It was increased to £70,000 on 19 July 2001, following the introduction of new staffing allowances for Members of Parliament. From April 2002 the allowance was increased to £72,310, remaining in line with the new staffing allowance figure for Members of Parliament. The current allowance is £90,854.

Severance Pay

Ministers and other paid office holders who receive a Ministerial salary are entitled to a severance payment when they leave office. Ministers who leave office are granted a severance payment, which generally equals three months of their annual ministerial salary. However, the Prime Minister and Speaker of the House of Commons are not entitled to severance payments as they have preferential pension arrangements.⁸

Notes:

- (a) The figures shown are the full entitlement. In 1979 the Prime Minister chose to forego any increase and from 1980 to 1991 accepted the same salary as a Cabinet Minister in the Commons. In 1997 the Prime Minister and Cabinet Ministers decided to accept the pre-election salaries of £58,557 (Prime Minister); £43,991 (Cabinet Commons) and £58,876 (Cabinet Lords). They also took a reduced salary in April 1998, 1999, 2000 and 2001. In July 2001 the Prime Minister and Cabinet Ministers agreed to draw their full entitlement. In 2009 the cabinet agreed to forego both the ministerial and parliamentary salary increases.

- (b) Until 1980 some Ministers of State received a higher salary than that shown here.
